Every year on February 20, Mizoram State Day is celebrated to commemorate the formation of Mizoram as a state. Nestled in the north-eastern part of India, Mizoram shares its borders with countries like Bangladesh and Myanmar. But have you ever wondered how this unique name came to be? Well, it's because the people who inhabit this region are known as Mizo.

Before Mizoram became a state, various tribes from north-eastern India resided in this region. The origins of these tribes are still somewhat mysterious. Historical records suggest that they migrated from China during the Mongoloid wave. Some believe that they emerged from the Shinlung or Chhinlung San regions, located on the banks of the Yalung River in China.

Interestingly, the first group of immigrants in this region was known as 'Kukis.' The second wave of people who moved to India came to be known as 'New Kukis,' and the last group was referred to as 'Lushais.' These tribes had a complex history, marked by tribal raids during the 18th and 19th centuries, as the Mizo Hills fell under British rule in 1895.

In 1935, a proclamation designated the Lushai Hills and Assam districts as an Excluded Area. This ruling sparked a political awakening among the Mizos, who despised British rule. The Mizo Common People's Union, later renamed as Mizo Union (MU), was formed on April 9, 1946, as the first Mizo political party. Although the party brought about some change, the Mizos were not fully satisfied, as the British still held significant control.
